Rabbi Weinstock's Message:

JUDGING OTHERS FAVORABLY:
THE DEEPER LESSON LEARNED FROM RASHI

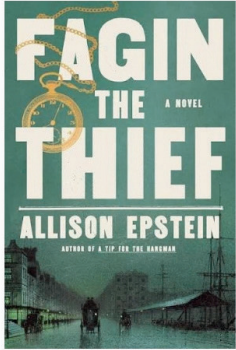

Why are we so quick to judge others, often assuming the worst before we know the facts? The answer may lie, at least in part, in our evolutionary history. For our ancestors, encountering a stranger could be a matter of survival. Was this person a friend or a foe? Could they be trusted, or did they pose a threat? Making that determination quickly could mean the difference between life and death. Over generations, our brains developed the ability to form impressions almost instantaneously, using cues such as appearance, behavior, and facial expressions. These mental shortcuts remain useful, but they also lead us to draw conclusions before we have enough information to judge accurately. Psychologists have also observed that we tend to give greater weight to negative possibilities than positive ones. From an evolutionary perspective, this makes sense: mistakenly trusting someone who posed a genuine threat could have devastating consequences, while mistakenly suspecting someone who meant no harm might simply cost us an opportunity. When the stakes were high, it was safer to err on the side of caution. Yet the instincts that once protected us can now lead us to misjudge others, attributing negative motives to ambiguous behavior and allowing first impressions to shape our perceptions. Our initial judgment may be instinctive, but it need not be our final one. Sometimes, the greater challenge is not recognizing danger, but giving another person the benefit of the doubt. Jewish tradition challenges us to overcome this instinct. As Rabbi Yehoshua ben Perachya teaches in the first chapter of Pirkei Avot: וְהָיִי דֵּן אֶת כָּל הָאָדָם לְכַף זָכוּת, "Judge everyone favorably."

Rabbi J. Simcha Cohen suggests that this lesson is embedded in a famous comment by Rashi at the beginning of Parshat Noach. The Torah describes Noah as נֹחַ אִישׁ צַדִּיק תָּמִים הָיָה בְּדֹרֹתָיו, "Noah was a righteous man, perfect in his generations." On the final word, בְּדֹרֹתָיו, "in his generations," Rashi cites a debate among the Sages over how to assess Noah's righteousness: יֵשׁ מִרְבוּתָיו דּוֹרְשִׁים אוֹתוֹ לְשֹׁבָה, כָּל שָׁכֵן אֵלָיו הָיָה בְּדוֹר צַדִּיקִים הָיָה צַדִּיק יוֹתֵר; וְיֵשׁ שְׂדוּרְשִׁים אוֹתוֹ לְנֶאֱמָר, לְפִי דוֹרוֹ הָיָה צַדִּיק וְאֵלָיו הָיָה בְּדוֹרוֹ שֶׁל אַבְרָהָם לֹא הָיָה נֶחֱשָׁב לְכֹלָם.

"Some of our Sages interpret this favorably: How much more righteous would Noah have been had he lived in a generation of righteous people! Others interpret it disparagingly: He was righteous only in comparison with his generation, but had he lived in Abraham's generation, he would not have been considered of any importance."

Rabbi Cohen identifies two lessons in Rashi's wording. First, the favorable interpretation appears before the critical one. This reflects the teaching of Pirkei Avot: our instinct should be to judge favorably, even when suspicion comes more naturally. Second, Rashi introduces the favorable interpretation with the words yesh me-rabboteinu, "some of our Sages," while introducing the critical interpretation simply as yesh, "others." Rabbi Cohen suggests that this distinction reflects a hallmark of Torah wisdom: the ability to restrain our instinct to suspect and allow a favorable interpretation to prevail. We live in an era that gives us plenty of reasons to be skeptical. Yet the Torah reminds us, both explicitly and through the subtle language of its commentators, that we must consciously cultivate the Jewish instinct to judge others favorably, even when our natural instinct is to do otherwise.

Our IDF heroes will be in Hollywood

NOVEMBER 1 - 9, 2026

SHABBAT, NOVEMBER 6/7
PARASHAT CHAYEI SARA

Israeli soldiers often experience a difficult transition back to civilian life after facing intense combat during their military service. Run by the Metiv Israel Psychotrauma Center in Jerusalem, Peace of Mind provides time and space for IDF veterans to process the psychological impact of these experiences in a supportive environment, including a week spent hosted in a Jewish community abroad. Hollywood is proud to once again play a small part in these soldiers' journey to a healthier future.

If you are interested in supporting American Friends of Peace of Mind and/or contributing to this program, contact Jamie Frank at (954) 651-1782.
